

Dear Megan,

I'd say most of my reflection is better represented in the discussion posts. I probably am writing too much there, but it's actually pretty effortless to be honest. Though, rehashing it here would be not of much use, as the more I write, the more I tend to struggle to write less; being concise/brief enough for a response like this now would be overboard, I suspect.

I always want to expand on nuances and cover all my bases, but as you see this results in what is nearly equivalent to essays each time. It's fun, but not much else new to say here. On the other hand, I guess I could pose a potential question that might be of use that might serve as a means to remain concise.

How strong (on a scale of 1–10) is your conviction (belief, understanding, legitimacy) in critical race theory and maybe constructivism in particular?

I am not sure if this native to Oregon, but Wikipedia says it's native to Northwestern United States. I took this photo a while back on one of my hikes on the Columbia River Gorge, I'm not sure where exactly to be honest, but it was one of the times I just drove a bit further than normal and found a random trailhead.

Apparently Coast Salish, Nuu-chah-nulth, and most western Washington peoples steamed, boiled, or pit-cooked its bulbs! They have a bitter/pepper taste! Interesting!
